THE CONCILIATION

Tarcău, the fairy, wanted to send her two sons to look for their father. She turned them into rivers. The boys had different characters, so they could not agree on whose name to travel under. So they decided to travel separately against their mother's advice.

Olt ran forward swiftly, in another direction Mures went slowly, silently, and as they went on, both grew, swelled into rivers.

Olt rushed on, he smashed everything in his path. But when he came to a strait, he was so tired, that he could hardly flow on.

He stopped, and wept bitterly:

`Oh, why did I not listen to my mother's advice! Here must I perish alone.`

As he wept, he heard the gentle, calling voice of Mures:

`Come, Olt, come! The Danube has embraced me and will take me to our father. Come, it will take you, too.`

Embracing each other, they saw their father, who was standing sorrowfully on the shore of the Black Sea, just where the Danube flows into the sea.

`Father, father! Look at us, here are your sons, Mures and Olt!`

But they could say no more, they sank into the sea and disappeared without a trace.
