PUMUCKL GOES TO SCHOOL

That morning Pumuckl came to a class that had drawing lessons. The children had to draw reeds. Pumuckl could only make simple drawings, for example a sailboat with five simple lines.

The teacher had to go briefly to the direction and asked one of the students, Hubert, to look after the class. But one boy noticed a chimney sweep on the roof of a house and the children ran to the window. Hubert kept calling out, "Go to your places!", but no one listened to him.

No one noticed Pumuckl as he hopped over the benches and looked for a short pencil that he could comfortably hold. Pumuckl was fascinated by the many white drawing sheets. He couldn't resist and drew sailboats everywhere, thinking he was being a good student.

When the teacher returned, he scolded the children for blustering and not drawing. Someone discovered the ships, but no one knew who smeared them on the sheets.

The teacher shook his head and asked, "What's with the grease?" Who was that?"

Of course no one answered. The teacher sighed and said: "I really can't leave you alone for five minutes."
